Summary

Dear reader, the idea to share with you my philosophical understanding of the term "love" is so responsible that I shudder. I hope I am not mistaken. So, let me try.

First, let's build a brief conceptual foundation based on my article "Consciousness and new ideas about the birth, life and death". To summarize, in this article, I wrote that nature consists solely of energy fields, and their respective energy waves. I assumed that these energy fields are conscious and so their thinking waves penetrate and manage everything. Further, the ultimate form and features of each new organism are defined, now of its conception, by the thinking waves of the energy fields that are piercing its energy conscious point at that moment.

These energy fields are very specific in terms of type and number. Each field is manifested in a specific organ or tissue of the new organism and leaves in that organ or tissue a certain part of itself. The new organism carries that part, or, more generally, substance, till the end of its life.

Now, let's build on that foundation with some new ideas.

These conscious energy fields, according to my hypothesis, have strict order. The most important field is the one that I call the field of pure love. This field is defined by pure selflessness and its sole role is to organize the other fields by saturating them with the purest form of love. I call it, by analogy with my known human world "Maternal energy field", or in short "Love". Now, let me try to clarify my understanding of the position of homo sapiens within this all-inclusive and all-encompassing field "Love".

First, it is important to always keep ourselves (and our egos) in check and never forget that homo sapiens is only a microscopic particle in the vast world in which we live. But then, we also need to know that the field of pure “Love” we discussed earlier does not distinguish between small and big - it is the same for all. This field warms the hearts of all living creatures and brings meaning to life. But which one of our organs is the manifestation of the field of love? Without a doubt it is our heart! Why? Because, unlike all other organs, if the heart stops, the body dies almost immediately. This is the simplest proof.

A more complex argument is linked to the purest love a human being can experience - the love of a mother for her new-born child. Each new-born immediately needs the mother's milk. In the process of nursing, the baby is always as close as physically possible to the mother's heart. And so, an invisible bond is created between the mother and the baby. I believe that, along with the nutrients in the mother's milk, this invisible bond results in a far more important exchange of energy - the energy of pure love. This early exchange of love is critical for the happiness of the new-born baby throughout all her life and it is most effective when the baby touches the mother's breast. By the way - because of that, there is no excuse, no matter the argument, for choosing to feed a new-born “artificially”, unless this is the only option (for example due to a medical condition that necessitates the bottle feeding).

But man is imperfect. When a child grows, the pure love in the heart of a new-born loses its purity. As the various energy fields within the human body interact with each other, they alter the pure love, and sometimes transform it into something very different, such as hatred. Hatred, which is the opposite of love, is the result of the energy of the mind taking over the energy of love. And mind often prevails in the interaction between the two fields.

We, humans, proudly call ourselves "Homo Sapiens" (Latin for “Wise Man”). We constantly suppress the field of love, or limit love to only its sexual expression. We make decisions, at both personal and societal level, only with our minds (or so we think). But, dear Reader, if you look deep inside, and truly “see” the results of many upon many of our decisions, can you, honestly, even for a moment, accept that those decisions were made and executed by a “wise man”, a.k.a “homo sapiens”? Clearly, the answer is no - a wise man would never make such decisions, let alone act on them.

These decisions are the result of love being transformed into other feelings, sometimes very different, even opposite to love, and the execution of these decisions leads to enormously devastating results for millions and millions of human beings, and life in general. The human history is a striking example of this. However, we can stop this from happening going forward. And I think it is completely possible and entirely within our power to do that. But How, you would ask? Simply - if the mind has the power to damage the field of love, the mind also has the power to heal it. And it is our obligation to do so! We simply need to put more effort in understanding the conscious energy fields, and we will find a solution to the problem.

When we, humans, rise above feelings, and remain just pure love, our world will make a decisive step forward to a much happier future.
